Brentwood rothers

VOLUME ONE

The Magic Notebook

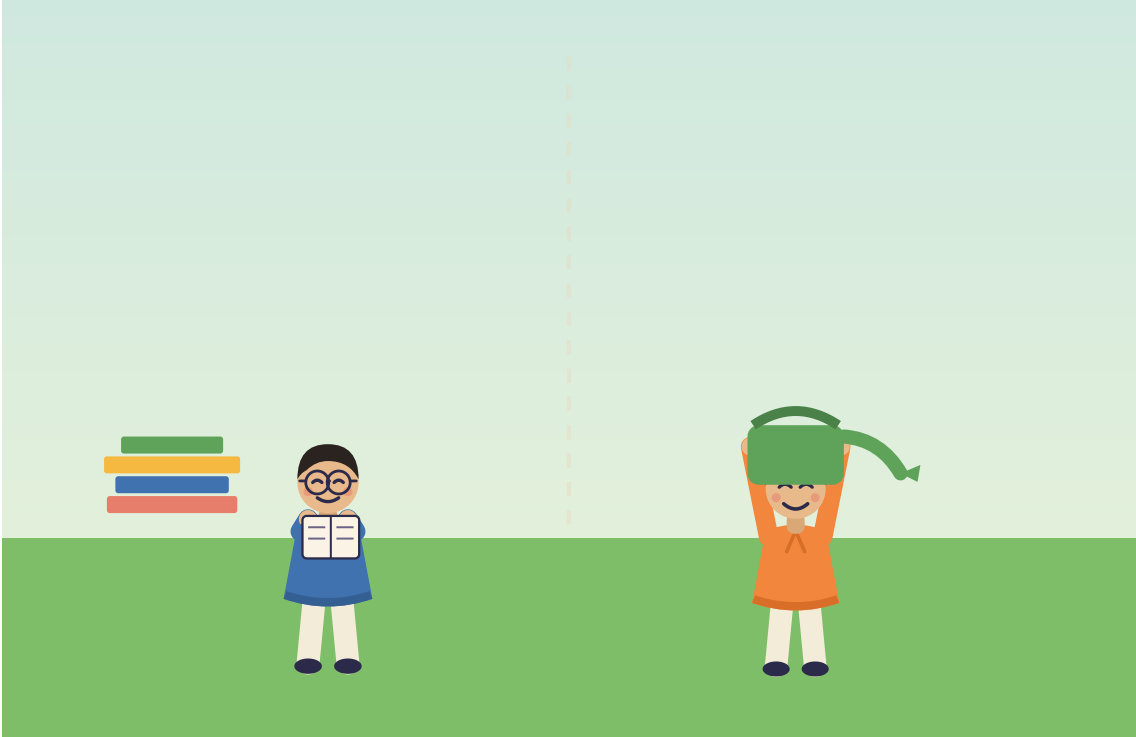

PAGE 1

In Brentwood, on a street with tall trees, there lived two brothers.

Sujith was eight. Saaho was four.

Sujith was the smartest kid on the block. He knew why the sky turned orange. He knew how many legs a spider had. He knew because he read.

Saaho was the strongest kid on the block. He could carry the big watering can. He could push the swing so high it squeaked.

Every evening the brothers ran to the backyard. Sujith brought a book. Saaho brought his hands.

“Read with me,” said Sujith.

“Books are boring,” said Saaho. “Books just sit there.”

One evening, when the sun went low and turned the whole yard gold, Saaho found something under the lemon tree.

A notebook. Small. Dusty. Warm, like it had been sitting in the sun all day.

“SUJITH!”

What you write here,
the yard will build.

Inside the front cover, one line was written:

What you write here, the yard will build.

Sujith laughed. Then he picked up the pencil and wrote three careful words.

a cloud slide

The air went soft. The grass went quiet.

And a slide made of clouds came curling down out of the sky, right into the backyard.

The brothers slid until their hair stood up.

PAGE 7

“My turn,” said Saaho.

He grabbed the pencil. He pressed hard. He made loops and zigzags and one shape that was almost a triangle.

Nothing happened. The yard stayed a yard.

An illustration of two children, a boy and a girl, building a fort using several large, white, fluffy clouds. The boy, on the left, wears glasses and a grey shirt. The girl, on the right, has pigtails and wears a grey shirt. They are standing on a grey ground. The background is a light blue sky with more clouds. The word "FOG" is written in large, bold, grey letters at the top center of the image.

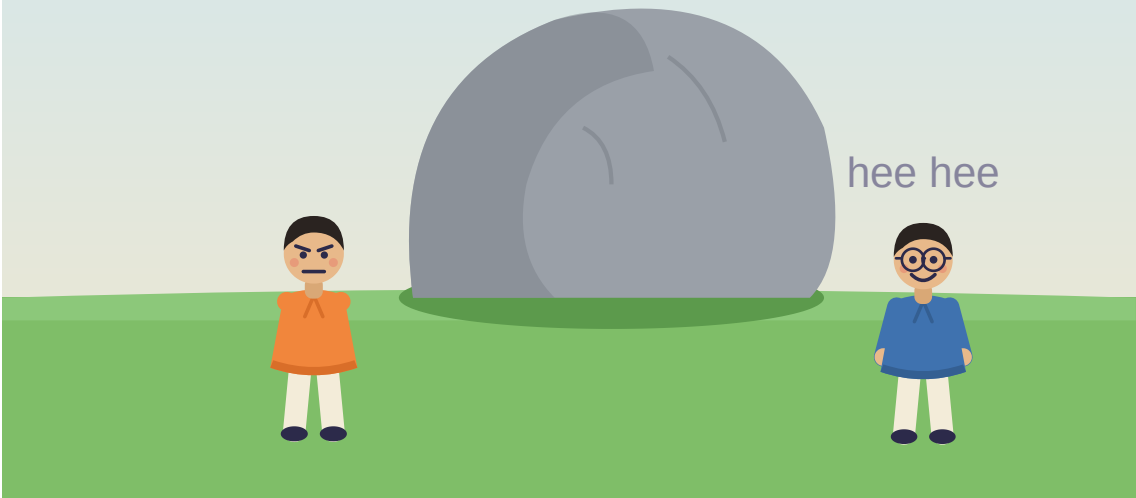

FOG

“Write letters,” said Sujith. “Real ones.”

So Saaho tried. He wanted a fort. He wrote F O G.

The whole backyard filled with fog. The brothers could not see their own feet.

PAGE 9

Saaho tried again. He wanted a rocket. He wrote R O C K.

A rock appeared. A very large rock. It sat in the middle of the grass and did absolutely nothing.

“That is the worst rocket ever,” said Saaho.

Saaho put the notebook down. “I am the strongest kid,” he said quietly. “But I cannot make anything.”

Sujith sat next to him on the grass.

“You are the strongest kid. You are just not the strongest kid yet at this.”

PAGE 11

Sujith took his brother's hand and moved it slowly across the page. One letter. Just one.

S. S for Saaho.

A tiny star lifted off the paper and floated up over the fence, blinking.

PAGE 12

Saaho watched it go all the way up. Then he turned to his brother.

“Teach me the next one.”
